Excerpt from Ice Formation: With Special Reference to Anchor-Ice and Frazil No one set of conditions may be said to hold from year to year, on account of the variations in the severity of the winters. Therefore, before an engineering scheme is carried out, a careful study should be made of neighboring conditions, previous summer and winter levels, and deductions made from a consideration of the native traditions over an extended region round about. Indeed, where possible, at least two years should be devoted to the study of the ice conditions at any particular locality where it is desired to erect an expensive plant. It is a well-known law of Nature that any change in a system in equilibrium due to outside conditions brings about a change within the system in a reverse direction. To convert a substance of higher energy-content (water) into one of lower energy-content (ice), a large amount of energy is liberated in the form of heat to resist that change. Water differs from ice in possessing a store of energy latent in itself and which we measure as heat. The magnitude of this energy may be realized when we remember that, in the passage of water into ice, enough heat is liberated to warm 143 times its own mass one degree on the Fahrenheit scale above the freezing-point. A study of ice formation means a study of heat transfer, and of the physical laws governing its movement from one body to another. It is my intention, therefore, before considering the practical details of river-ice formation, to run over, in as brief a manner as possible, the laws governing heat transfer. A review of...
