Excerpt from Contractual Forms for East-West Industrial Cooperation: New Thinking in the East, and in the West? First, and in the Marxist terminology of the socialist s themselves. The objective material conditions under which these two principles must be implemented have changed. Two key changes are present, although only one is readily and publicly admitted to by spokespersons in these countries: 1) technological development has made industrial production necessarily international in a qualitatively new sense, and 2) the relatively stable growth in the capitalist world since World War II and its extensive development of an effective international trade and financial structure combined with the relative failure of the socialist community to develop a competing form for a multilateral international economic system has guaranteed the operation of the international trading and financial system largely in a form not altogether different from the present capitalist system.
